

a staff job but refused it, requesting to be seconded to the flying, as an observer, until he was fit enough to rejoin his regiment in the trenches. A week later he was reported missing and I heard no more for eight months, although every effort was being made to find him. Then the International Red Cross, at Geneva, sent me a telegram from Germany, saying that they had killed him eight months before April 15th, 1918. His machine had been shot down in flames; they refused to say where. After three years I found his grave myself. The Germans buried him where he fell, Nevy Chapelle, and now the British have removed him to the British cemetery at Merville."

DUNCAN ELLIOT

1906-1909

DUNCAN ELLIOT was a boy at St. Paul's School from 1906 until 1909. After three years at the School he continued his studies under Dr. Milnor Coit in Munich. From there he proceeded to England where he prepared for Princeton. Instead of entering that university he spent some time on his uncle's ranch in Wyoming and then returned to England. By October, 1914, he had "joined up," receiving a commission in the Border Regiment, in which he served with distinction. A member of his family writes as follows:

"He was severely wounded in December, 1917, being shot through the shoulder. He could use his arm but little, so could not shoot or even carry his pack. He was offered
